The Wisconsin Court's divisive brand of partisanship on the social distancing directive risks making the worst public health threat in a century deadlier and the most severe economic downturn since the Great Depression more catastrophic.

Statewide - The Wisconsin State Supreme Court majority's divisive and partisan decision late Wednesday afternoon, along with the obstructionism of the Legislature, risks making the worst public health threat in a century deadlier and the most severe economic downturn since the Great Depression more catastrophic.

In a major national emergency--a pandemic, a depression, a major war--success depends on elected leaders (including judges) and the public putting aside the divisions of normal politics and pulling together to take effective and decisive action. Wisconsin has a history of doing just this, but the divide-and-conquer politics of the last decade, which have transformed the Wisconsin Supreme Court and the Legislature, is now undermining the political and social unity needed to rise to the challenge.
