First Jan. 6 hearing to reveal new evidence of Trump conspiracy, panel aides say

MADISON - The U.S. House committee investigating the Jan. 6, 2021 attack on the Capitol will use its first public hearing to tie the violent attempt to overturn the election directly to former President Donald Trump, committee aides told reporters Wednesday.

In addition to live witnesses — a U.S. Capitol Police officer injured by rioters during the attack and a documentary filmmaker — who are expected to testify Thursday evening about the violence they witnessed that day, the House Select Committee Investigating the Jan. 6th Attack on the U.S. Capitol will present taped testimony from high-ranking officials of the Trump administration and campaign and Trump family members, aides said.

They are expected to reveal previously unseen information related to Trump's involvement in a conspiracy to undo the election results.
