President repeatedly warned that his effort to overturn the election was illegal and could lead to violence, Republican lawmakers could be further implicated.

WASHINGTON, DC - The House committee investigating the Jan. 6 attack on the Capitol heard from its first White House witness Tuesday, scheduling a last-minute hearing and promising bombshells from Cassidy Hutchinson.

Hutchinson, a special assistant to Trump chief of staff Mark Meadows, had a front-row view of Jan. 6, operating at the intersection of both the White House and Trump campaign efforts to keep the president in power.

Here are six takeaways.
