Residents in Green Bay and Wausau share their stories and contribute their vision for the state.

MILWAUKEE - The divide and conquer tactics of the last seven years have made it harder for Wisconsinites to have real conversations about the issues they face in their communities each day. It's time for a different approach and fresh leadership that encourages real conversations about the struggles and successes Wisconsinites endure each day. Last weekend, Wisconsin residents gathered in Green Bay and Wausau for Kitchen Table conversations hosted by Democratic gubernatorial candidate, Andy Gronik, to discuss the issues that matter the most to them. Wisconsin residents sent a message loud and clear that government isn't listening to them and it's time for a change in leadership.

Green Bay residents sent a message loud and clear that the powers that be in Madison have abandoned Wisconsin's culture of good-paying jobs, great public schools, clean environment, and healthy communities. "The powers that be are destroying Wisconsin culture," said one long-time Green Bay resident, immediately identifying the attacks on local control, lack of support for public education, and destruction of the state's natural resources as evidence of the rapid departure of things that have always made Wisconsin a great place to live, work, and play. Residents identified city's public transportation infrastructure and local roads as areas where Green Bay could use support from their leaders in Madison.
